

Programme

Improving the impact of development projects in Sub-Saharan Africa through increased UK/Brazil cooperation and partnerships

Thursday 17 – Friday 18 November 2016 | WP1492

Held in the San Tiago Room at the Itamaraty Palace, Esplanada Dos Ministerios.

The United Nations' (UN) 2030 Agenda for Sustainable Development acknowledges that countries across the African continent require more focussed and scaled-up assistance to ensure that they are supported in protecting the most vulnerable and reaching more universal achievement of the new Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs).

Both Brazil and the United Kingdom have – in different ways – been providing cooperation and development assistance to countries across the continent for many years. Given the distinct approaches to cooperation taken by the UK and Brazil – that of a traditional Development Assistance Committee member and a horizontal partner respectively, what value and impact could be achieved by a more collaborative and integrated style of cooperation provision for countries in Sub-Saharan Africa through a united partnership? Where is the space for African agencies and partners?

It is crucial that cooperation and assistance of any kind is well thought out and supported by enabling conditions on the ground in order to facilitate sustainable, inclusive and sustained socioeconomic development. There will no doubt be a greater say for the Global South in the rules-based international system and a strengthened participation in international decision making and global economic governance, so development cooperation needs to reflect this changing landscape.

How could a blended, modern approach to socially responsible, inclusive and sustainable development best combine the perspectives of developing countries, developed countries and the important voices of the cooperation partners and recipients of aid and assistance? What new strategies, policies and partnership could evolve between Brazil and the UK that might deliver additional and more effective development impacts for African countries?

In partnership with the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Alexandre de Gusmão Foundation (FUNAG)

1330-1500	Lunch
1500-1630	9. The future of partnerships: Conclusions, commitments and continuity

In this session, participants will be encouraged to propose ways of taking the discussions and operational recommendations forward in practical ways. It will give an opportunity to map ideas to processes, propose timescales for adoption of changes, and identify potential for adoption of new strategies. The session is intended to provide measurable ways for participants to act upon the ideas explored at the meeting and secure commitments to action points from all. What value and impact can be achieved through a united partnership? How can stakeholders secure and implement actions and commitments, bearing in mind that the concept of a hybrid approach is broader than this kind of configuration? What role is there for International Financial Institutions and other funders in financing and resourcing development partnerships in Africa?
